About the Conference

e-Assessment, the use of technology based assessment, is increasingly becoming part of the mainstream and sits equally well in the classroom and the workplace. The e-Assessment Question conferences, since 2003, have been at the heart of the debate around the best way to design, deliver and implement computer based assessment and its role in learning and certification.

The focus for the conference in 2015 will be on innovative and inventive tools and techniques to digitally assess knowledge, skills and understanding. That is the new processes and procedures that still ensure fit for purpose assessment, in an economic and effective way.

In light of FELTAG and others, the education and training spotlight is clearly on skills and the impact of technology on a wide range of training and development programmes. The conference will look closely at how e-Assessment can support the assessment, learning, and administration of both formative and summative assessment, and in the delivery of academic and vocational qualifications.

The expectation of learners and policy makers is for robust and reliable tools and technologies. Whether these tools are used in an academic or a work based learning environment, whether your concern is in how to cost effectively and develop efficiently these tools or to implement them, whether your concerns are about integration within already established learning and qualification pathways, or conversion from established programmes such as basic and key skills, the conference will look at the practical issues of assessing and certifying these skill sets.

The conference will provide a forum for debating the issues, the challenges, the risks and the options.
